Columbia University-Mailman School of Public Health

In carrying out Columbia's great educational mission, today's faculty must answer many of the same questions that have always confronted outstanding teachers and scholars. What would we have our students know? What bodies of knowledge, what sets of methodologies, what world views should our graduates take away with their degrees? The Royal Charter formally establishing King's College in 1754 defined the institution's goal as "the Instruction and Education of Youth in the Learned Languages and Liberal Arts and Sciences." This mandate has not essentially changed, even with the transformation of King's College into Columbia, one of the world's foremost research universities. Columbia's undergraduate curriculum combines the breadth of learning provided by general education courses with the solid mastery of a discipline achieved through a major. And, because Columbia is a great research university as well as a small liberal arts college, students with the will and ability to pursue their majors to the highest levels of scholarly sophistication are free to do so. Lionel Trilling, the eminent literary critic and a member of Columbia's faculty for 44 years, spoke for many at the University when he said, "There is a certain minimum of our intellectual and spiritual tradition which one must experience and understand to be called educated." Through the years, Columbia has resolutely upheld this high standard. As we approach the twenty-first century, the University is committed to preserving the quest for knowledge as more than simply a practical pursuit. Through its broad range of

NYU Silver School of Social Work

New York University School of Social Work offers a MSW in Clinical Social Work. The program is dedicated to the development of social workers who practice with individuals, families and groups in an integrative, holistic manner. Our students are prepared to work in a wide range of settings with a diversity of populations. We have a "small school" atmosphere within the context and resources of a major university. Classes are small, faculty members are accessible, and our school is located in three historic town houses on Washington Square Park in the heart of Greenwich Village.

. The School's MSW program is also available on the campuses of St. Thomas Aquinas College in Rockland County, New York; the College of Staten Island; and Sarah Lawrence College in Westchester County.

The MFA Writing and Literature Program is a 42-credit hour program. We are at the Southampton campus of Stony Brook University located on the East End of Long Island's south fork, with course offerings primarily at Southampton, but also at the Stony Brook Manhattan campus. Our program emphasizes creative work in fiction, poetry, and scriptwriting. However, the program also extends its emphasis beyond the familiar categories of creative expression to treat all forms of writing as equally relevant to understanding and mastering a world constructed out of words. In particular, the program broadens its interest to include forms of scientific writing – environmental, medical, technological – to draw benefits from the university's well-established strength in science.
