STORY

It is 1918 in Stockholm. Beautiful Madeleine Godard runs an exclusive dress shop. Her frequent journeys to Paris arouse the vigilance of passport and customs officials, but her stock of Paris gowns invariably clears her.

Madeleine always takes her new Paris models to the home of "Countess Lindenstrom"—actually the headquarters of the German Secret Service, where we learn that the whereabouts of the Allied armies have been cleverly embroidered into the gowns in code.

Baron von Marwitz, a German officer, arrives in Stockholm, ostensibly on sick leave. He pursues Madeleine until she accepts his invitation to dinner. Her suspicions of him are aroused when she sees a newspaper report of his condemnation by a Court martial as a deserter.

Bob Carter, a young English Secret Service Agent, loves Madeleine but this does not keep him from going to London to enquire into her activities. During his absence, Madeleine's friendship with Marwitz develops into love and he asks her to marry him.

The German Secret Service agents complain that the information she has been supplying to them is incorrect and that her Paris source is either incompetent or working for the French Government. They command her to go to Paris and learn the truth.

Carter's assistant shadows Madeleine and when she arrives in France she is arrested and questioned. Monsieur Cottin, head of the dressmaking establishment she represents, effects her release, however, and we learn that she is actually a member of the French counter-espionage. Cottin presents her with the Medaille Militaire, but says she must perform one last mission. She must return to Stockholm and learn who is head of German Section Eight.

Marwitz celebrates her return with a dinner party. A German officer passes their table and calls Marwitz a deserter. Marwitz passes off the insult with a laugh and Madeleine leaves in disgust. He follows her to her flat and there she confesses that she has just learned that he is actually the head of Section Eight, posing as a deserter. Marwitz also confesses he knows her true identity.

Madeleine proposes flight, but Marwitz is pledged to break up Madeleine's activities.

Putting duty before love, Marwitz has her shop raided and Madeleine captured. The Swedish Police, however, acting under orders from Carter, arrest and deport her to save her from the Germans.

Marwitz boards a submarine, stops the steamer and takes Madeleine off. A British Q-Ship sinks the submarine and takes Madeleine and Marwitz aboard. Marwitz is transferred to a British destroyer whilst Madeleine stands at the rail and cries "I'll be waiting!"
