"THE DYNAMITERS" IS PACKED WITH MILE-A-MINUTE THRILLS

(Review)

With a story literally torn from today's headlines, "The Dynamiters", coming to the... Theatre next... is a mile-a-minute action thriller of the adventures of a private investigator.

Starring Wayne Morris as the investigator, Patrick Holt, Sandra Dorne, James Kenney, and Simone Silva, the film tears the lid off the underworld and exposes the cunning organization behind a gang of safebreakers who stop at nothing, even murder, to achieve their ends.

When a private investigator is called in to unmask the gang, he begins by offering a reward for a clue to the identity of the gang leader, known as "Mr. G." Certain characters with an extensive inside knowledge of the underworld warn him he is playing with fire and urge him to drop his investigations.

The gang strikes again, this time at a jewellers where they steal a valuable diamond tiara and other precious stones. Thanks to an observant girl who happens to be secretary to the investigating agency, and with whom the investigator himself is in love, the gang is linked with a band of street musicians. The girl trails the musicians whose odd behavior and movements convince her she is getting close to the truth.

In a terrific climax the gang is rounded up, but one all-important point still remains unsolved: the identity of the leader known as "Mr. G."

The unmasking of the leader provides the surprise denouement of a film that emerges as one of the most exciting packages of thriller entertainment ever...

Wayne Morris plays the investigator with firm authority, and there are excellent performances from Sandra Dorne as the secretary, James Kenney, and Patrick Holt.

A highlight of the film is its introduction of a new song-hit, "Soho Mambo", which is sung in a night-club scene by the provocative and attractive Simone Silva.

"The Dynamiters" was produced by Geoffrey Goodhart and Brandon Fleming, and it was directed by Francis Searle from an original story and screenplay by Brandon Fleming.

THE STORY

Jimmy Exeter, of Anglo-American Investigations, invites to track down the Dynamiters, safebreakers and killers, accepts the assignment against the wishes of his chief, Rutherford. He has offered a reward for a clue to the identity of the leader of the gang, known as "Mr. G."

He seeks information from Popoluos, proprietor of the Green Dragon Club, reputed to know more of the underworld than any other man, and who is under an obligation to him. Popoluos, however, will not be drawn.

Jimmy is phoned by a man who says he has information, but before he can say another word there is a sound of a shot, and the line goes dead.

That night Jimmy takes Sally Morton, secretary to Anglo-American Investigations, with whom he is in love, to dinner at the Green Dragon. There he learns that the man in the phone booth was Popoluos' head waiter. On his way home, after taking Sally back to her flat, he is attacked by a thug whom he knocks out.

Next morning, Lady Willshaw calls at Hartford's, jewelers, to leave a valuable diamond tiara for repair. It passes through the hands of a young man named Chapman before being locked up in the safe.

Chapman calls at a pawnbroker's shop, kept by a man named Scoble, to raise money on a ring he has stolen from Hartford's. He casually mentions to Scoble about the tiara. The Dynamiters raid Hartford's, shoot one of the night-watchmen, and get away with the tiara.

While the raid is in progress, three street musicians are playing at the back of Hartford's. Sally, whose flat is nearby, throws them a coin and is struck by the fact that they suddenly change their tune as a policeman comes in sight.

When the raiders have escaped in a stolen van, the dying watchman manages to call the police. Tommy is abandoned in a side street, and the raiders, with a buncho and an accordion, in which the jewellery is hidden, join the other musicians.

Sally hears of the raid, and at once connects the musicians with it. She trails the musicians to Scoble's, noting that there are now five instead of three.

Sally rushes back to Jimmy to tell him she has discovered the Dynamiters. She tells him this in front of Chapman, who at once sees the result of his chance remark to Scoble about the tiara. He hurries to the pawnshop, attempts to blackmail Scoble for a rake-off, and is cold-bloodedly murdered by Scoble.

Jimmy informs the police about Scoble's and then phones the news to Rutherford. Rutherford calls at Sally's flat and asks if she'd like to come to see the gang round up. They drive off in his car, without noticing that Popoluos, in another car, is following them.

The police corner the gang, who try to shoot their way out. Scoble escapes with the jewellery, but Jimmy spots him, and in a struggle on a landing, Scoble falls to his death down a staircase. The gang fires the shop, and dies in the blaze.

Sally - recovering consciousness from a whiff of gas - finds herself in a dilapidated warehouse on the river. Rutherford discloses himself as "Mr. G.", and says he has been using Anglo-American Investigations as a cover for his criminal activities. He intends to get away with a ship with the loot, and to take Sally with him by force. But Jimmy and the police, led by Popoluos, who has suspected Rutherford all along, find them, and Rutherford is arrested.
