Independent producer-director Peter Curran planes out to London tomorrow (26) to set up initial stages in the first of a series of co-productions between London and New York film groups. The first subject, "The Old Lady of Threadneedle Street", is a whimsical comedy-drama for which a top star will be announced shortly. While in London, Curran will complete casting and production arrangements, returning to New York within a month. Shooting in England is due to get under way in August.

Curran, a producer-director in England between 1946 and 1953, has been operating in a like capacity in New York and Canada for the past three years, also acting in an Associate Producer berth on a number of CBS television projects.

"The Old Lady of Threadneedle Street", written by Curran and to be directed by him, is the first film on the schedule of a newly-formed company set up by Curran and his associate, William K. Everson. It will be followed by "Town House", which will be shot in New York. Thereafter, Curran plans to alternate between Britain and the U.S. on a series of films, each budgeted at approximately £125,000, and designed, from the standpoint of plot content and star names, for both British and U.S. general markets.
