Gain an international comparative perspective on language and health professions at NYU London in the Department of Communicative Sciences and Disorders at NYU’s Steinhardt School of Culture, Education, and Human Development. Through Steinhardt’s global pathway in communicative sciences and disorders, you can complete a major course requirement and gain insight into a new culture. While at NYU London, you won’t just experience one of the world’s most storied and internationally significant cities—you’ll also obtain a relative understanding of public health and medicine between the United States and the United Kingdom.
If you are a sophomore or a junior majoring in Communicative Sciences and Disorders, you are encouraged to spend your fall semester at NYU London, where you’ll analyze systemic differences in public health and service delivery models and make site visits across the metropolitan area. You’ll be able to take your required communicative sciences and disorders course as well as a variety of electives and core courses or satisfy requirements for a Psychology minor. You’ll also participate in guest lectures, tour facilities, and conduct observations of clinical services across disciplines like speech-language pathology; counseling and psychological services; nursing; art, music, or drama therapy; and more.
